As the Black Lives Matter campaign gathers momentum around the world, there's never been a better time to talk to children about prejudice, diversity and inclusion.

With the recent news dominated by images of mass demonstrations, children are likely to have questions about what they have seen and heard.

Parents and carers can play a key role in starting the conversation which can shape their child's world view and help to build a more inclusive and aware society. As Frederick Douglass, prominent American social reformer and abolitionist, said: "It is easier to build stronger children than to repair broken men."

No one can be expected to provide all the answers to such a complex issue and racism is far from a one-conversation topic, but it's important to take the first steps.

Fortunately there are many resources – both online and off – available to support you as you talk about the issue.

Gaming

Online gaming can offer many positive experiences. It can give children and young people the chance to escape into a virtual world, to learn, and to connect with others.

However, there is a risk of children and young people viewing inappropriate content in games and being contacted by adults seeking to exploit them.

This week your activity pack for parents and carers to deliver to their children explores how they can stay safe while gaming:

In this bright and friendly picture book, children learn that it's okay to worry about coronavirus. Fun rhyming couplets keep the tone gentle and supportive, and you will find plenty of ideas for dealing with coronavirus in a positive way.

Everybody Worries offers your child the reassuring message that this crisis will pass, we are there for them, and we will get through this together.
